

Immigration and the U.S. Government

It might surprise you, but the word 'immigration' is not in the U.S. Constitution.

Article 1, Sec. 8 says that the U.S. Congress shall make "uniform laws of naturalization", and Section 9, says that "No Capitation, or other direct, Tax shall be laid, unless in Proportion to the Census..." In other words, a tax could be laid on slaves, or indentured servants, coming into the United States.

Nowhere does the U.S. Constitution say that the current sitting U.S. President, or U.S. Congress, or U.S. Supreme Court, has the last and final say, about immigration policy.

The 10th Amendment seems to indicate that a State's Governor has the right and responsibility to protect the borders of his State for the good of his State and its people, as best he sees fit to do so.

Therefore, the current flood of un-naturalized people, coming across the border, for presumably, permanent, (and unknown purposes), can and should be prohibited by the Governor/s of those States where such incursions are incurring, and such actions that are necessary to stop or prevent such incursions are not unConstitutional, and do not require the blessings of the U.S. Federal Government!
